A 7-year-old, intact male castrated Pointer was examined because of clinical signs, including inappetence, anorexia, and weight loss.

Prerectal ventral edema and mild mesenteric lymphadenomegaly were identified at physical examination, and a computed tomographic scan of the abdomen revealed a mesenteric mass. Exploratory laparotomy revealed a well-circumscribed, hypopigmented, soft-tissue mass with a rubbery consistency that extended from the mid-small intestine into the rectum. Histopathologic evaluation of samples from the distal intestine revealed extensive necrosis and ulceration of the mucosal epithelium, with transmural edema, mild inflammation, and necrotizing granulomatous inflammation in the lamina propria and submucosa. Numerous acid-fast organisms were detected in the necrotic material by cytologic, histologic, and bacteriologic examination. The infected tissue did not stain with acid phosphotungstic/methyl blue (PTA/M-B) or Sudan black, indicating that this necrotizing granulomatous inflammation was not of mycobacterial origin. PCR-based analysis revealed Mycobacterium tuberculosis DNA in the peripheral blood. Postmortem examination of the entire gastrointestinal tract, including the thymus, spleen, liver, kidneys, lungs, prostate, urinary bladder, heart, and brain, was negative for gross and histopathologic lesions consistent with granulomatous inflammation. The presence of M. tuberculosis in an intestinal sample was not confirmed by genotyping of the bacilli in comparison with M. tuberculosis reference strains. An isolate of Rhodococcus equi was cultured from a peripheral
